With JotForm s fillable PDF form creator you can create customized PDF forms thatÂ .Q: Do I need a lock when I call HttpClient.SendAsync I have seen that some of the new HttpClient calls by.NET framework are synchronized. It appears as if we should never call SendAsync unless we have a lock on the HttpClient object. Is this true? If so, why? For example, is there any benefit to doing this: using `(var client = new HttpClient()) { // why do I need a lock here? var response = await client.GetAsync(""); } A: the HttpClient class is not thread safe - it uses` `ConcurrentDictionary` for its collections, so this is not a normal locking issue. If you're not worried about throughput you can probably forget about the lock. If you are worried about concurrency, then you'll need the lock to make it thread-safe.

A: So the answer to your question is basically 'no'. The `HttpClient` is designed to work with cached resources on disk, and will work well with multiple threads without re-synchronisation. All of the specific details will be in the MSDN documentation, but the general advice is that you will not need to use a lock with the HttpClient when making multiple asynchronous calls, as individual threads will work with the cached resources. If you are working with an I/O bound implementation of HttpClient, then you might have a race condition if you don't synchronise the calls. I don't know of any specific example off-

Contributors Friday, May 28, 2011 Through the week you can enter the week 7 competition by tweeting at us all week. This week you can take away a copy of Joseph Heller's Catch 22 at the end of the week if you win. We will announce the winner this weekend. First prize for the individual who has uploaded the most photos into the gallery at the end of the week is a copy of Through the Walls and a copy of Marlon Brando's A Streetcar Named Desire at the end of the week. I've had a few weeks off so decided to start again with a new personal challenge. Each day this week I plan on posting a photo of my daily menu for that day. I'll be posting only once a day until the end of the week at the weekend - you can look back through the week's menu if you like. For my first go I've decided to mix it up a bit and use a non-food related subject. Yesterday was International Workers Day, today it's 'the world's best TV light show'. The photo above is of the CCTV cameras in Hong Kong. They appear quite similar to the security cameras in St Louis. There are several up in the sky too but they are mostly for technical reasons as they are used for weather purposes. If you come across a photo today that you like please feel free to share them on
